Frequently Asked Questions

Q1 What does a leasing and licensing practice cover in Indian real estate?

It covers drafting, reviewing, and negotiating lease deeds, leave and license agreements, sub-lease deeds, fit-out agreements, and CAM agreements. The practice also handles stamp duty compliance, registration, rent structuring, and dispute advisory across residential, commercial, retail, and industrial properties.

Q2 When should a business engage a leasing lawyer before signing a lease?

Ideally before signing any LOI or term sheet. Early involvement helps structure rent escalation, lock-in periods, termination rights, and fit-out obligations correctly. Retrofitting protections into a signed document is far harder and often results in unfavorable compromises on key commercial terms.

Q3 Which Indian laws govern lease and license agreements?

Key statutes include the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, the Indian Stamp Act (plus state amendments such as the Maharashtra Stamp Act), the Registration Act, 1908, and applicable state Rent Control Acts. RERA may also apply where leasing involves developer-held inventory in registered projects.

Q4 How long does lease registration take, and what drives the cost?

Registration timelines vary by state. In Maharashtra, e-registration of leave and license agreements typically completes within a few days. Stamp duty is the primary cost driver and differs significantly across states, calculated on total rent, deposit amount, and lease tenure as prescribed by state stamp schedules.

Q5What documents are needed to draft or register a lease agreement?

Typically, parties must provide identity and address proofs, property title documents, prior lease records, sanctioned building plans, occupancy or completion certificates, property tax receipts, and any existing NOCs from housing societies or landlords. For companies, board resolutions authorizing the signatory are also required.

Q6What common mistakes do tenants and landlords make in Indian leases?

A frequent error is executing leases exceeding 11 months without registration, which renders them legally unenforceable under Section 17 of the Registration Act. Other pitfalls include vague escalation clauses, missing termination mechanics, inadequate sub-letting restrictions, and incorrect stamp duty payment leading to penalties on adjudication.
